Firstly my experience with Lightroom 4 was so poor, that I didn't want to try it again. After 6 months of 'fiddling' with my files, I finally bit the bullet and jumped on the LR5 bandwagon. I really enjoyed the changes like being able to delete all duplicate files that I had in different folders. It basically was all fresh new and clean. However, after about a month of using it, I began to notice that wherewithal has taken a bit of a hit. Loading times have increased dramatically and I have lost a while rendering out a JPEG of a 4K file. The biggest problem with Photoshop is still the Registration hardware. The tools aren't as intuitive as the brush tools, and it is common that non-photographers complain about changing things. While there are many ways to do this so-called registration, I often have to hit the old Balance button to realign, a point which the auto-alignment tools don't always seem to catch. Further, the auto-alignment tools - while useful - are not as responsive as the alignment tools in the brush tool boxes. A good way to get around this problem is to create a mask and then "Crop to Selection". Then you can simply paint the edges of the mask with the brushes in the brush toolbox. One of the plugins unique benefits is the masking feature which allows you to clone your image around the edges. If the image is larger than the canvas it will always fill the empty space. You may have to revisit the file format settings and pixel row units and/ or adjust the pixel density for proper rendition in smaller files.
